About hypertension

Diuretics are no longer the drug of choice in the management of mild hypertension, reports the Virginia Heart Institute.

The mortality rate has been reported to be increased in those mild hypertensives receiving diuretic treatment as compared to those patients with mild hypertension who receive no treatment at all.

The patients susceptible to this increased risk are those hypertensive patients with underlying heart disease, particularly of the silent type.

Diuretics reduce serum potassium and can precipitate serious arrhythmias. Patients receiving diuretics for mild hypertension should be re-evaluated by their physician in order to consider possible drug alternatives such as the Beta blocker group as well as dietary reduction of sodium intake.
